

Because Meaning

Language Change through Iconicity in Internet Speak*

Anneliise Rehn

I. Introduction

Typically, because takes a clausal complement (e.g. because he left) or a nominal complement preceded by of (e.g. because of him). Recently, however, we find usages of because followed by a bare noun, verb, adjective, or adverb (e.g. because internet, because want, because awesome, because honestly). These usages (hereafter referred to as the because X construction) began in written internet communication, but have since spread to spoken interactions as well. This thesis examines the relationship between this new syntax and its new semantics and pragmatics, and argues that speakers play on listeners' syntactic and semantic expectations to draw attention to the form of their utterance. This enables an iconic connection between form and meaning, which in turn drives the generation of pragmatic enrichment.

The methods utilized for this study are linguistic analysis, a compilation of attested examples (Appendix A), and a qualitative survey of speakers' interpretation of selected examples (Appendix B). The corpus and survey results are included as appendices.

A database was compiled from the internet through google searches of common combinations. Any page that has one of these combinations is searched for other usages of because, since the author/site has demonstrated a penchant for the construction. This category (Huddleston & Pullum, 2002). The subordinating constructions, not unlike prepositions generally, each allow a different set of possible complements.

The well-established allowable complements for because are as described above: a nominal complement preceded by of or a clausal complement. There are, however, examples – stretching back long before the internet age – of because followed by a reduced form, most commonly an Adjective or Adjectival Phrase, such as (emphasis added):

(3) [the cattle were] sold along the way because tired or lame. (cattle drive account, 1783)

(4) The wealthy, healthy, wise, famous and those favored by song, women and wine, all have, in individual instances committed suicide because “tired of life”. (Amyrc 1898, p. 109)

(5) Taboo connotes Greek ἄγος and ἄγιος, Latin sacer, holy or accursed because awesome. (Hopkins 1918, p. 67)

Each of these instances display because followed by adjectival phrases rather than the typical clausal or nominal complement. Crucially, examples (3)-(5) appear to operate on pure ellipsis; no meaning is added to the sentence due to the reduced form of because's adjectival complement. The cattle in (3) were sold because they were tired or lame. They and were can easily be filled in from context, and the reader loses nothing of the meaning by their ellipsis. Similarly, the individuals in (4) are said to have committed suicide because they were “tired of life.” The expansion of (5) could include it is before awesome. This elliptical process functions analogously to that for other grammatical words, such as the comparative than. In (6)-(8), a noun, an adjective, or a verb sits isolated after than, and the rest of the subordinating clause is easily filled in without affecting the meaning of the sentence:

(6) Kim is taller than Jesse ~~is tall~~.

(6') Kim is taller than Jesse.

In this case we see is tall from (6) removed in (6'), leaving only a noun after than, but with no considerable difference of meaning conveyed.

(7) She gave out more blue toys than ~~she gave out~~ red toys.

(7') She gave out more blue toys than red.

Similarly (7') refers to an identical scenario as (7), though toys has been removed. In this case an adjective red is isolated after than.

(8) She more grunts than ~~she~~ sings.

(8') She more grunts than sings.

This case follows a similar procedure, this time the pronoun she is deleted, leaving the verb sings isolated. The process of ellipsis for than-clauses is similar to the ellipsis process for the old examples of because X given in (3)-(5).

The external syntax of because allows it to occur either before or after the main clause in a sentence, so that (2) could be restated as (2'):

(2) I'm going to the sandwich shop because I'm hungry.

(2') Because I'm hungry, I'm going to the sandwich shop.

The entire because clause has been moved before the main clause. While this is an option for typical because, this external syntax does not hold for because X. So that the sentence (9) would not be found reworded as (9').

(9) It rarely works out that way, because....tired. (Mabry 2014)

(9') *Because....tired, it rarely works out that way.

In this case, ...tired is only enabled as a complement to because after the main clause, as in (9). Because X never occurs before a separate main clause in a sentence. This restriction on the external syntax for because X relates to its semantic and pragmatic function. The expectation created by because for an explanation of what precedes it enables the semantic associations discussed later in this thesis.

Linguists and other language scholars have informally discussed the development of because X. The American Dialect Society's selection of because as their 2013 word of the year highlighted this discussion (American Dialect Society 2014). Most of these linguistic analyses have focused on what exactly is going on syntactically. These analyses of the syntax of because X have sometimes mirrored the previously described debate about the word-class status of because. Some have stated – based off the traditional grammar classification of because outside of the preposition class (as mentioned in Huddleston & Pullum, 2002) – that because has now become a preposition, titling the new construction prepositional because (Carey 2013, Whitman 2013). Gretchen McCulloch points to an issue with this interpretation: if we take the definition of preposition which includes subordinating conjunctions such as because, the new development cannot be toward re-classification as a preposition (McCulloch 2013). McCulloch argues that the syntactic change in the modern usage is instead an expansion of the allowed complements for because to include interjections. The argument that all the complements used in because X are interjections is difficult to defend, however, with examples such as reasons, tired, and patriarchy.

Furthermore none of these analyses consider the past examples referenced above in (3)-(5), where a construction which appears syntactically just like because X occurred before the modern internet era. The emphasis on the syntactic shape of because X ignores the more significant facets of development on semantic and pragmatic layers.

Discussions of because X have also considered where this new syntax could have come from. Several theories have been advanced. The comment section of a Language Log post holds almost as many origin theories as there are commenters; everyone remembers hearing it first a different time (Lieberman 2012). One origin suggestion in the comments points to January 2011 craigslist ad which started a because racecar meme. Another commenter suggests the sign off because fuck you which stretches as far back as 2001. Another pushes the date further back still, all the way to the 1980s with one of a series of Deep Thoughts on the television show Saturday Night Live, which had the following sentence (emphasis added):

- (10) If you ever fall off the Sears tower, just go real limp, because maybe you'll look like a dummy, and people will try to catch you because, hey, free dummy. (quoted by John Laviolette in Lieberman 2012)

The inability of observers to pinpoint the first time because X occurred meshes cohesively with the historical examples provided above and points to the significance of because X lying elsewhere than in brand new syntax. Instead, new semantic and pragmatic associations with the construction are what have made it new. The conversations surrounding because X on the internet so far have only casually considered semantics.

III. Semantic Development

The typical meaning of because is examined by Torgrim Solstad (2009). He describes how because establishes a causality relationship between the complement of because – as causer – and the main clause – which is caused. This causation can be understood as either a direct cause or as a rational for the action in the main clause. From this analysis, we see that the placement of because in a sentence creates an expectation on the part of the listener for an explanation for the main clause. This can be seen in (11):

(11) Amy owns a musical instrument because Leslie gave her a guitar.

The complement of because, in this case Leslie gave her a guitar, is expected to be the cause of the main clause Amy has a musical instrument.

Additionally, within the semantics of because, we see a subtle but significant difference in the function of the different types of complements, entities vs. events. If the nominal complement within the of-phrase is an entity rather than an event (cf. Pylkkänen 2008, pp. 86-87), we see an interpretation required on the part of the listener. They have to be transforming the entity into an event, so that in (14) The listener will interpret because of Sue to mean ‘because Sue endorsed Lynn’ or ‘because Sue resigned’ or whatever else the context provides.

(12) Lynn won the election because Sue bowed out of the race.

(13) Lynn won the election because of Sue’s resignation.

(14) Lynn won the election because of Sue.

The entity complement in (12) requires no such interpretation (note that this difference is drawn on semantic lines rather than syntactic as (13) provides an example of nominal complement which doesn’t require this interpretation because it refers to an event). This listener process connects with the regular assumption that events cause events and entities do not cause events. This traditionally established process of semantic interpretation to deal with non-prototypical causes could help enable the semantic interpretation seen in the rise of because X. When compared with other subordinating conjunctions, such as the semantically similar higher register since, we do not see the same semantic interpretation flexibility. Since – when meaning because – cannot take nominal complements, as seen in the ungrammaticality of (15’)

(15) Lynn won the election since Sue bowed out of the race.

(15') *Lynn won the election since (of) Sue.

Despite sharing the same context as the because examples in (12)-(14), since cannot license the nominal complement Sue.

Because X functions differently from because in semantic interpretation. The X component often does not meet the expectation of explanation which because raises. Analogous to the entity placement after typical because cuing the listener to the necessity for some additional analysis, the lack of a proposition cues the speaker to analyze because X more closely. The application of the entity to event analysis above, however, often results in semantic underspecification or leads to the wrong interpretation, as seen in (16).

(16) A PRAYING MANTIS WEARS 3D GLASSES BECAUSE SCIENCE (Walters 2014)

This comes from the title of a video. Even if science in this sentence is taken as an entity associated with the causal event for the main clause, the meaning of the sentence is unclear: thorough what event could science cause the praying mantis' activity? Instead, science likely represents the speaker's inability to provide an explanation.

As stated above, because X, unlike typical because clauses, cannot occur at the beginning of the sentence, before the main clause. This provides evidence that because X relies on the expectation of an explanation having been created. When a because clause comes before the main clause, the listener's expectations are focused on the main clause – i.e. the listener expects a likely effect of because's complement. The structure of the sentence wherein because follows a main clause, however, focuses this expectation on the complement of because (to provide an explanation for what they've heard in the main clause). This makes the listener consider carefully why their expectation wasn't met and what reasons the speaker might have for not providing an explanation. This sends the listener right into a Gricean analysis seeking where in the communication agreement the fulfillment of their expectations broke down. This Gricean analysis proves crucial to the understanding of because X.

IV. Pragmatic Analyses of Because X Instances

In examining the pragmatics of the situation, I use q to represent the expected utterance and p to represent the given utterance, which replaces the expectation. The expected q in a complement for because is a cause or rationale for the main clause. After because, as in a discourse after a why question, Grice's co-operative agreement would have the speaker giving an explanation to the best of their ability (cf. Grice 1975, Levinson 1983 pp. 101-102). When instead, the listener hears a single word – the given utterance p –, which often does not provide even a possible interpretation which would fulfill this burden of explanation, the listener considers why the q proposition was not provided. If the speaker is assumed to be both informed and desiring to communicate cooperatively, the Gricean implicature drawn from this situation is that the choice to utter p rather than q was that q is false. Since the placement of because does not specify exactly what q would be – instead, it can be any explanation –, q being false can be taken to mean that q – any explanation – does not exist. The use of because X when X is not a sufficient explanation for the main clause can be understood by the listener to mean that the main clause has no explanation.

The above implicature is drawn by speakers in some cases. It is very likely the case with the following example:

(17) Need a new blog[...]Because...Because reasons! Damn you. Because. (Kat 2012)

In (17), the author of this blog states that they need a new blog and then utters because, raising that expectation of explanation. Then, the ...because reasons does not provide the reason, but rather highlights the absence of one. This implicature relies, however, on the established informational and discourse contexts. The listener must know that the speaker has access to all available information and that the purpose of communication on the part of the speaker is such that they wish to provide an explanation. In (17) we can assume that the blog writer has access to information pertaining to why they need a new blog. The discourse context could be called into question, and instead of the ‘not q’ reading above, we could have a reading that by violating the maxim of quantity, the speaker communicates that they are in fact not wanting nor feeling the need to explain why they are starting this blog. These same two options are available in (18).

(18) Eating green pepper and onion pizza at 9:30 at night because yay. (Sydnee 2014)

The speaker presumably has access to whatever practical reasons they might have for eating that pizza at that time. By saying yay instead of I haven’t gotten a chance to eat all day or I’ve been craving this pizza for weeks and I just flew back home or any number of other logical qs, the speaker violates the Maxim of Quantity. From this, the listener could draw either the implicature that the speaker has no real reason for eating the pizza or that they do not wish to explain their late night pizza-eating habits. The aftermath of because X as illustrated by these examples is significant underspecification as to the intended meaning of the sentence.

In its underspecification, Because X can convey to a listener several different meanings. For this thesis I organized the meanings into four categories: SARCASM, INHERENCY, SUMMARY, and DIVERSION, represented respectively by (19)-(22):

(19) This shaming tactic can be employed in the following way: “I can ignore your emotions and opinions because... patriarchy!” (Tieman 2012)

(20) awesome because awesome (Scratch 2010)

(21) But then my Emmy snub rage is tempered because YAY MAYIM!! (laugh 2013)

(22) Why are there turtles in the living room? Because Boycie (Urban 2012)

Each of these conveyed meanings, into one of which any given instance of because X will likely fall, relies on a pragmatic understanding between the speaker and the listener because they each violate Gricean maxims. In the first place, the atypical syntax, identified by some speakers as “incorrect grammar” can be said to violate the Maxim of Manner, specifically the sub-maxim Be Orderly. By using the less accepted grammatical form because X, the speaker draws attention to the form, and the listener draws the implicature that the specific phrasing is intentional and tied to the meaning of the utterance.

The meaning of SARCASM flouts the Maxim of Quality – i.e. Do not say what you believe to be false. My database catalogs 27 instances of this meaning association. In (19), the example of the Sarcasm category, the speaker does not believe patriarchy actually justifies the previous sentence. By presenting an obviously false meaning, the speaker sets up the negation of that statement in the listener’s mind.

The Maxim of Quantity – i.e. Provide as much information as is required – is apparently flouted in because X in the Inherency and Summary categories. Example (20) demonstrates a truism of the Inherency category, where no explanation for the part of the utterance before because is offered except a re-utterance of a word from it. I marked 23 instances as belonging to this category. Here the expected quantity of information – an explanation – is not provided, but the implicature is that in fact that explanation is not required, that the explanation is so inherent as to be obvious. The Summary category, represented by (21), shows the reduced because complement standing in for a larger explanation. In this case, because YAY MAYIM does not provide all the information required for explanation, but that can be interpreted from context. For this category, the implicature from the Maxim of Quantity cues the listener to look for explanation and interpret it from the incomplete explanation given. The process for Summary cases is the most similar out of all the meaning categories to the entity to event analysis for typical because as described in section IV. This category encompasses 148 of my examples. Further investigation of the meanings associated with summary suggests a sub-category where the summary – incomplete though it is – is also the summation of possible explanation.

The Maxim of Relevance is flouted in the Diversion category. This category, accounting for approximately 61 of the instances in my database, labels when the speaker provides a because-complement that has no relation whatsoever to the main clause. The example of (22) above comes from an Urban Dictionary entry for the definition of because Boycie, under the definition “The excuse for anything” (Urban 2012). Given that the Urban Dictionary is crowd sourced, this definition likely operates in a small linguistic community, but similar usages of because X – with the X as an irrelevant “excuse for anything” – exist in different communities. Another case that’s more generalizable is because followed by George Bush or Obama. In this flouting of the Maxim of Relevance, the implicature is that the speaker does not wish to attempt an explanation.

The results of my survey lay bare the Gricean analysis on the part of listeners due to the underspecification they must wrestle with. Because X, like other creative word plays, gives a window here into a linguistic process.

In answer to the survey question “Consider the Sentence: The current situation is just not sustainable for any of us. Because reasons. Why doesn’t the speaker state their reasons?” One respondent wrote:

“I think because the reasons are either unknown, unclear or stupid. This way, the listener is more focused on the incorrect grammar than on the fact that there were no reasons stated.” (Meaning Survey)

In this responses first sentence, we see the underspecification described above. In the given context the reasons being unknown, unclear, or stupid are three different options for the intentions of the sentence. Furthermore, the listener’s response displays that the form of the sentence (“incorrect grammar”) is highlighted by the use of because X. The form being highlighted is what enables iconicity being drawn from the form.

V. Iconicity Enabled in Because X

Iconicity contrasts with the general linguistic understanding and conception of language as arbitrary, wherein the form of a linguistic sound or motion is not connected in any logical way with the meaning communicated by that sound or motion (cf. Hockett, 1959). The only way a speaker can discern the meaning from the form is based on previous social experience. As one example, consider the word monkey. There is nothing in the string of sounds [mʌŋki] which inherently connects with the animal whose image the word calls to mind.

This arbitrariness is true of most words. Some exceptions are recognized as iconic, to varying degrees. The quintessential iconicity example is onomatopoeic words, such as crash. In this case, our spoken word attempts to imitate the exact sound made in a crash. We call that connection between form and meaning iconicity.

Certain words can be iconic and grammatical constructions can as well. The discussion of this form-meaning connection in grammar was stirred up in the early 1980s with an Iconicity in Syntax symposium (Haiman 1985). One paper presented by T. Givón describes in a broad theoretical framework the ideas behind our understanding of iconicity and ways we can see how language developed through iconicity (Givón, 1985). This paper shows traditional linguistic understanding of iconicity as an attempt by speakers to produce a linguistic form based closely on the real world meaning, to produce a type of imitation. Then as language develops that imitation moves gradually away from being similar in form to the meaning until it is completely symbolic and we have that standard arbitrariness of language, with no remaining form-meaning connection. So we see traditionally understood a trajectory from more iconicity to more arbitrariness as language develops. Because X fits into this conversation in a new way.

First, on a foundational level, formal markedness has been argued to in any case indicate added meaning. A departure from the expected or default syntactic form will lead the listener to look for additional meaning from what they would expect in the default form. This markedness iconicity is attested in because X.

More specifically, the shape of the syntax in because X enables iconicity. The reduced form of a single word in the place of a full clause or phrase links with the reduced explanatory sufficiency of the because X clause. As stated above, because creates an expectation of either a cause or reasoning for the main clause to come after it. The reduced explanatory sufficiency of because X disappoints this expectation.

As established in section II above, the because X form was in fact existent before the modern internet popularization. This makes because X a case of iconicity where the meaning has been gleaned from the form. Traditionally understood iconicity described above is when a linguistic form is created to match its meaning. Contrary to this uni-directional view of iconicity, Lars Elleström (2010) argues for additional trajectories for “iconicity as meaning miming meaning and meaning miming form,” with the latter being a hypothesized situation wherein a meaning will be drawn iconically from an existing form. Because X fits here in the discussion as just such a situation. The case of because X demonstrates that you can have bi-directional iconicity, with an existing syntactic form becoming usable and noticed due to the addition of semantic associations which were drawn from the form.

To more closely examine the iconic connections between form and meaning in instances of because X, we can look to the different categories of meanings gleaned from its use. The categorizations used in this project are represented in sentences (23)-(26) below.

(23) This shaming tactic can be employed in the following way: “I can ignore your emotions and opinions because... patriarchy!” (Tieman 2012)

This sentence is uttered in a video by an individual arguing that feminists use the referred to tactic unfairly in arguments. The implication is that the provided complement to because is understood to be an inadequate explanation for the main clause, fitting within the reduced explanatory sufficiency meaning from a reduced form explanation above. (23) represents the because X semantic category of Sarcasm, while (24) represents the category Diversion:

(24) This exercise in surrealism comes at seemingly no provocation from an artist at Bandai’s capsule toy department because reasons. (Mike 2014)

This comes from a blog post describing a toy collection, and the usage of the construction carries the meaning of Diversion, where the speaker provides a word that basically changes the subject. This category iconically conveys that the explanation is inaccessible to the speaker at this time. The Inherency category also draws an iconic connection.

(25) awesome because awesome (Scratch 2010)

The above instance is the title of a collection of images on someone’s website. It represents the meaning category of Inherency. The juxtaposition of awesome in the place where an explanation for awesome is expected conveys the meaning that the explanation is inherent in the main clause. This connects iconically through the idea that the explanation is so obvious as to be unnecessary. This meaning category nudges the listener to reconsider the main clause and to agree with the speaker on just how self-explanatory the main clause is.

(26) Oh and by the way, as an offshoot of that Benda storyline, Ultron's consciousness wound up in outer space eventually because, you know, comics. (IGN 2013)

This entry comes from a video where the speaker is explaining the fantastical events of a comic book storyline. By saying because, you know, comics, the speaker does not provide a spelled out explanation, but rather a shorthand summary. The meaning in (26) can be categorized as Summary. This usage of the construction cues the speaker – here explicitly – to consider outside knowledge. The idea conveyed is that that a sufficient explanation is not required because of the shared knowledge of speaker and listener. This categories' iconic connection comes from the speaker's intentional use of the reduced syntactic form to highlight the lack of necessity of a complete explanation within the community of his listeners.

Throughout the categories and examples presented to represent the meaning categorizations, it should be noted that the meanings interrelate and sometimes even with all available context, the categorization is unclear. This does not present a problem to the present analysis but rather bolsters it. The underspecification in meaning connects with the iconically represented reduced explanatory sufficiency.

VI. Discussion & Conclusion

This thesis evaluates the syntactic change and semantic development in the rise of the because X construction in recent years. In Section II, attempts at syntactic classification and some theories on the origin of the construction are considered, in comparison to analysis of the syntax of typical because. This thesis takes the position that because X syntax existed as a rarely used elliptical variant prior to the modern rise in popularity.

The recent events surrounding because are notable on account of the semantic development examined in section III. This section demonstrates how because X after the main clause fails to meet the listener's expectations for an explanation, cuing them to closely analyze the utterance pragmatically. The development relies on a semantic and pragmatic underspecification. Section IV argues that the underspecification resulting after pragmatic processing draws the listener's attention more closely to the form of the construction, enabling an iconic connection. Finally, section V delineates the iconic connection between the form of because X and the meanings associated with it, and further explains how the pre-existence of the form makes this an instance of Elleström's theorized "Iconicity as Meaning Miming Meaning".

In conclusion, we see that the recent rise in popularity of because X is based in an interplay of semantics, pragmatics, and iconicity. Because X provides a case study for how language can develop through added iconic connections.

Do the following sentences mean the same thing?

Why might a speaker choose to utter (a) as opposed to (b)?

He would do so in a more casual setting, and to emphasize the wanting.

It's more joking, informal, and sort of leads to a broader range of possibilities, encompassing the entirety of their desire.

That said, I don't know that they would; usually I see this new usage of because with nouns (e.g., "I looked at cat pictures because Internet") rather than with verbs.

Because they are copying their linguistic patterns of typing where they want to efficiently communicate their meaning Shorter?

I think it has to do with the memes and internet stuff like that. There is a loss of grammatical morphemes in a lot of the captions, making it funnier.

No idea

More casual conversational setting, emphasis

Possibly an English learner where pronouns are often omitted to exaggerate the verb "want" in a sort of joking way, esp. common in text/social media

They're trying to show the depth of their desire for said info by channeling society's idea of what a more primitive English would sound like. Their desire, they imply, shuts off the parts of their brain dedicated to uttering sentences that are longer, regardless of whether they are more accepted as correct or not.

Do the following sentences mean the same thing?

What meaning does (A) either lack or add compared to (B)?

A fails to parse.

The first one is not grammatically correct, and semantically, there is not much meaning to it.

B means you need information because you badly desire it. A doesn't mean anything because it's not a real sentence.

A lacks the formalism of B... and somehow that indicates a different meaning that I can't put into words.

A is much more exaggerated and might even be joking or sarcastic. B would mean the person actually really wants it.

(A) is nonsense. The meaning is, I suppose, semantically the same, but (A) looks either like a non-native speaker's utterance or something specifically intended to sound childish and ungrammatical

Do the following sentences mean the same thing?

Do the following sentences mean the same thing?

Why might a speaker choose to utter (a) as opposed to (b)?

twitter character limit

Cuter?

I'm not sure, but this definitely the "because x" construction that people use for comedic timing. Dropping the preposition messes with the even footing of the phrase "because of", and it's also funny as a one word rejoinder to a potentially complex question.

in online/text communication it's a common construction to show playfulness, jest, etc

In modern parlance, uttering something like "yay animals" implies that animals are inherently positive, and that therefore it is not necessary to express in more detail why the second clause implies the first clause.

No idea. Both are awkward though

It's shorter and in slang, (there are) seems optional.

Because the existence of the animals is implied by saying animals already. I don't understand the first part though...

Do the following sentences mean the same thing?

What meaning does (a) either lack or add compared to (b)?

Adds enjoyment/enthusiasm for animals as well as the info that there were animals present

I would never say b because I wouldn't connect two parts of the sentence with yay. A also implies that the speaker expects the reader to automatically understand why animals are awesome and why that would make the birthday friend happy.

I think (a) lacks a specificity in regards to the animals. Were they at a zoo? Did the birthdaying friend get an animal printed shirt? Etc.

A suggests a more general theme--maybe the party was animal-themed and the friend loves animals, but animals weren't actually there, and broadens the friend's love of animals. B is very specific to the presence of animals.

A does not necessarily imply that there were animals wherever the friend was. It could just be that the friend loved "it" because the friend in general enjoys animals.

"Birthdaying" is not a word!

No idea what either means

B means there were animals at the birthday. A means animals were involved but it's not clear if physical animals were present or were on the wrapping paper, etc.

Consider the following:

What does the 2nd sentence convey?

She made the cake for her spouse because they find it the cake theme awesome.

The fact that Minecraft (or Minecraft creepers) and/or the wife making the Minecraft cake is awesome. I would go with the former--Minecraft, rather than the wife, is awesome. Really it suggest that there's no need to explain the wife's decision to make the Minecraft cake, as Minecraft is "awesome."

The wife is awesome.

That the reason your wife hand-made a Minecraft creeper cake is that Minecraft (or Minecraft creepers) are awesome

What second sentence?

It's trying to convey that the wife made the cake because she's awesome. Or that the fact that his life is now awesome because his wife made the cake. I'm not sure.

That minecraft/cakes/herdery are awesome because the cake was awesome, but 'because' hasn't changed to be able to be used with adjectives yet (it's not as common) so it just sounds dumb. 'Because' is in the process of being used with nouns, because internet.

The second sentence conveys the speaker's emotions about their wife and the situation she created.

The reason she made it is she wanted to because it's cool, not because she had to.

That the first sentence denotes something was awesome, hence the reason for the action in the first sentence.

The cake was pretty cool. Or the wife is?

It conveys that the cake was made because the wife is awesome, not because anything else was.

"Because awesome", in my opinion, means that the idea in general of making a creeper cake is awesome.

There's 2 possible translations: 1. Because of general awesomeness associated with the concept of making a Minecraft cake. 2. Because her making a Minecraft cake specifically was awesome. By the way, I've never really heard "because + adj" in common parlance... it's usually "because + noun", but maybe I'm getting old (because science, because reasons, etc). "Because awesomeness" or "because awesome sauce" or something would sound more appropriate.

If there were a word before “awesome,” what would it be?

It's

is (if allowed more than one word, it/Minecraft is)

She's

"it"

she's or it's

"they're"

she's

it's

I'm

it's

"that is", or "it is", or even "she is"

"it's" "she's"

Do the following sentences mean the same thing?

Do the following sentences mean the same thing?

Why might a speaker choose to utter (a) as opposed to (b)?

More emphatic, more expansive, adds an extra criticism of the patriarchy or suggestion of its overarching presence.

Perhaps because they were being more casual and speaking with friends to exaggerate patriarchy in a jestful way

Shorter?

Internet speak

Because that is Tumblr talk, it implies that the patriarchy is always present doesn't need to be introduced by a definite article

A makes the patriarchy seem like a larger, autonomous thing. It implies you know everything about patriarchy and how it might affect a girl. Sentence b gives more clarifying info as of the speaker wouldn't be implicitly aware of the connection.

Because it sounds more stupid.

no idea

If they're on the internet, if it's casual, if they're trying to be funny. b would still be used in formal/academic settings.

Do the following sentences mean the same thing?

What meaning does (a) either lack or add compared to (b)?

A failed to parse patriarchy means the concept/idea/discourse around patriarchy rather than just the actual patriarchy we live in

In (a), patriarchy has a much wider breadth of meaning. It means the whole general system of male-controlled society and everything that affects.

It changes the scope of where patriarchy extends. (a) means patriarchy at large, and (b) means a specific patriarchy... I think.

Meaning (b) seems more academic and clinical whereas (a) seems to use the patriarchy as a catch phrase.

B refers to a specific patriarchy, while A refers merely to the concept of patriarchy.

Consider the sentence:

Why don't they state their reasons?

They don't really have any

Maybe there are too many, they don't have time, or they just don't feel like it Because. Just kidding. I think because the reasons are either unknown, unclear or stupid. This way, the listener is more focused on the incorrect grammar than on the fact that there were no reasons stated.

They are unwilling to disclose them, for some reason they don't want to reveal

They are unnecessary or unhelpful or too long/complicated to state, or because they do not wish to.

I'm put off by this sentence. It makes the speaker seem lazy, as if they don't care enough about the situation to even give a full sentence.

They may be too mundane to bother mentioning or too convoluted to support brevity?

The reasons are universal and known.

Because they're lazy or they don't actually have reasons or they're stupid.

Perhaps they are too complicated to be stated easily? Or the person is trying to be vaguely belligerent or pull rank or something by not being clear about their reasons?

It's funnier. Because humor.

Reasons might be obvious or selfish.

There are too many, or they do not know them, or they cannot articulate them or the reasons are shared knowledge with their listener

Consider the sentence:

Why does the speaker use the 2nd sentence?

It suggests that the speaker *doesn't* have reasons because s/he can't think of anything more specific.

He cannot think of specific reasons.

What second sentence?

Consider the sentence:

Does the speaker have reasons?

yes 7 70%

no 3 30%

Do the following sentences mean the same thing?

yes 7 43.8%

no 9 56.3%

Do the following sentences mean the same thing?

Why might a speaker choose to utter (a) as opposed to (b)?

To emphasize Ferguson

Internet, casual, funny

emphasie ferguson

More casual/more emphasis

It makes the event seem more looming, more like an exasperated explanation

I don't really see a difference...

Again, it's just slightly broader/more expansive. It also suggests that Ferguson isn't really the reason as much as what came out of Ferguson, whereas the second sentence localizes it more to Ferguson itself.

Do the following sentences mean the same thing?

What meaning does (a) either lack or add compared to (b)?

I don't actually really understand either sentence

A fails to parse

Ferguson is an example that illustrates the point in a and the reason in b

In the latter, it seems more clear that "Ferguson" is referring to the event itself, rather than to a location or person.

(a) implies a closer connection to the events at Ferguson surrounding Michael Brown

(a) doesn't mean anything to me; this construction only works when it's referring to a concept or an idea; I interpret "Ferguson" as a specific event here.

It lacks "of"

I suppose unlike the last question, (a) doesn't refer to a more general "Ferguson" (unless the term was semantically expanded to mean any kind of American racial conflict), but it would be used for the comic timing that "because+noun" has. (b) is simply the same phrasing but in standard English.

Sentence a is demeaning to what Ferguson accomplished or means. It is a subject that shouldn't be treated with sarcasm, exaggeration, or joking language.

Consider the sentence:

Does the speaker have reasons?

yes	4	25%
no	12	75%

Consider the sentence:

Why does the speaker use the 2nd sentence?

Because they are too lazy to explain the real reasons.

It's sort of like saying because reasons exist.

To illustrate a celebration of arbitrariness that doesn't discriminate against any form of reasoning so long as there are reasons.

Because reasons.

To emphasize his/her lack of reasons.

sarcasm

What second sentence?

To avoid listing reasons

To possibly prevent someone asking for reasons they don't have

To enhance how ridiculous it is that they are being arbitrary. They are further pointing out that they have no reasons.

Because they feel like they should have reasons they don't know how to convey

I honestly do not know.

The speaker has no actual reasons

To be annoying

Entertainment? Adds fun to discourse
